[From the London Times, 7th instant.] An august and ancient tribural-the most ancient and angust of any save the " High Court of Parliament "-yesterday virtually ceased to exist. The Court of Queen's Bench, which represents a tribural heid before the King himself at least a thousand years ago, sat yes erday for the last time, and in all buman probability will never sit again. It may not technicalty cease to exist until November, and until then it survives merely as an ens rationis-an ides or conception of the mind; but it will actually assemble no more. It beld a sitting on Morely for the purpose of giving judgments, and toose judgments will be its last, for, unless semething unforceen happens it will never sit again. It is impossible (as Lord Coleridge observed a year or so ago) to contemplate without a feeling of interest, and perhaps a passing pang of regret, the extinction and passing away of so august and ancient an institution. Even in this country, so tenacious in its traditions and institutious, and most of all, in its judical institutions, the Queen's bench, as it was curtly called, or, to use its correct legal title, "the court of the King before the King himself"-"coram ipso rege"-was the most ancient of all, and far more uncient than Parliament it-elt; for it can be traced back clearly in the substance of its nature and character, and in the essence of its jurisdiction to the time of Alfred-above ten centuries ago. It is a curious circumstance that, reckoning from the accession of Alfred in 871-tre earliest date at which such a jurisdiction can be shown to have been exercised-to the year 1870, when the original of the judicature act which abolished it was introduced just a thousand years should have elapsed. It is one of the greatest glories of Alfred

that he gave a close and z alous attention to the administration of justice -- especially crimical justice -- by all the judges in his dominions, and corrected their errors or excesses; and in all succeeding reigns down to the Conquest, and ever since the Conquest down to this day, there can be traced the existence of a tribunal, held originally before the king in person and his council, before which all interior judges were liable to be cited, their abuses or excesses of jurisdiction corrected, and their exercise of their jurisdiction compelled and controlled. It is exactly that jurisdiction which the court of King's bench has always exercised since it existed by that name, its great distinction being that it was the court of error from all criminal courts, and that it was the court which exercised a sovereign jurisdiction over the magistracy and a supreme power in the way either of commanding trem to exercise their jurisdiction in cases within it, or of probibiting them from exercising it in cases not within it, or of setting aside their sentences if they exceeded their jurisdiction, or of punishing them it they abused it. In short, the very jurisdiction which from Affred's laws and Alfred's life, we find that great sovereign, like so many of his successors, exercised in person, this great court bas exercised ever since it existed as a legal tribunal, with that proud name and title so well expressing its ancient origin, and so clearly showing its identity with its ancient original, "The court of the King before the King himselt." So early as the reign of Henry II. we find it mentioned by that name and title--" as held before the King himself"; though in the reign of Edward we find the King insisting that the judges should tollow him wherever he went to sit in his council, and as late as the fitteenth century it was sometimes described as held " before the King in council" -- " coram Rege in Concilio" Lord Coke proudly bonsted that, like the enancery, its title was " Coram Rege," and he boasted that it excelled the chancery in dignity as being "coram ipso rege." But, in truth, these two great courts were in dignity the same, both being held before the King in person or his council, and both exercising that high prerogative jurisdiction which Lord Bacon described as the "Præ torian jurisdiction" of the chancery and the "Censorial jurisdiction" of the King's bench. There is reason to believe that the jurisdiction of the Star Chamber was but an irregular development of the high jurisdiction of this great court before it was clearly defined and established, and when the Star Chamber was abolished all that was legal in its jurisdiction, or rather all that was not unconstitutional, and much that was not strictly legal, passed to the King's benchand went to augment its lofty jurisdiction. One part of it most certainly had that origin, the jurisdiction exercised on "criminal information"-a jurisdiction long controverted, de nied, or doubted even by Lord Hale, and not firmly established until it was sanctioned indirectly by statute after the Revolution. It was telt that there must reside somewhere the power of exercising an extraordinary jurisdiction for punishment of great delinquencies which could not await the slower process of ordinary law, and so that part of cognized. So, again, in this great court reall inferior judicatures in the trial or execu | so seemed to appreciate it. tion of criminals, and for this purpose it could remove a case from any other court the function of this court to exercise that with, "Farrell did it; arrest him." of the crown-namely, to prevent "a failure | similar tenor. best days this court became, indeed, the great a storm of hisses.

The spoke-man then began the exceedingly difficult task of securing an investigating commutee from the audience, as the -cepties were naturally suspicious of contederates. Many names were at once shouted from all parts of the house as soon as the spokesman asked for some "prominent citizens of Boston." Dr. Moran stepped upon the stage, and was immediately greeted with hisses and ealls to step down and out from all parts of the house. When he stepped up and shook bands with Madam Little the signs of disapproval were very loud, and o e youth suggested to the Doctor to "swim out." Still the roll of prominent citizens was being called, and the nomination of "Mr. Somerseemed to please, but, he not accepting, Mr. Farrell appeared, and was told from the audience that he belonged to the ring.
